"Good leaders must first become good servants."

PATRYCJA:

My work is made out of plasticine and presents 4 grey chairs, 1 yellow chair and red connecting lines.

What I made looks not difficult but I put the important meaning behind it. When you want to become a good group leader, first what you have to do is build some support and listen to people and their needs. Red lines are the symbols of the connection between the leader with the others, but when you look at it closer it presents a person - the head is a leader, the arms and legs are the group participants and together they form an inseparable whole.

Oliwia about Patrycja work :

In Patricia`s work I can see five stools - four of them are blue, and one that is in the center is yellow. Blue stools are connected with the yellow one by red lines.

I think her work means, that a good leader can't exalt. A good leader has to become one of them -a servant, because without this they will not be able to stay in connection or agreement.

KASIA:

I used plasticine in my work. I formed the snails in different colours, with a black arrow between them. One snail has a crown, the other does not. They are the same size but the crown has an important task here.

The snails in my work can be interpreted in different ways. These are creatures that have in their species a division into classes, positions. The green snail is a representative of the lowest social class in snails. But the blue snail has a crown so he is a king and represents the highest social class in snails. Just like there is a queen bee in the hive. The arrow between them means that even the least important snail, the so-called servant, can become a leader king or queen through work and perseverance.

Victoria about Kasia's work :

I have the impression that an ordinary snail can go a long and slow path to become an important and respected snail, that it is feasible even for an ordinary snail.
